

Childhood Exposure to Domestic and Family Violence

Executive Summary

Domestic and family violence occurs across all age, socioeconomic and demographic groups, but predominantly affects women and children.¹

There is mounting empirical evidence of the effects of exposure to domestic and family violence on children's development, and a growing recognition of the ways these harms can manifest in intergenerational cycles of trauma, violence and disadvantage.²

Impacts on children's behaviour, schooling, cognitive development and physical and mental well-being include:

- impaired cognitive functioning;
- poorer academic outcomes;
- increased aggression;
- lack of emotional control;
- destructive behaviours;
- learning difficulties;
- depression and poor mental well-being;
- low self-esteem;
- low school attendance; and
- bullying.³

The cumulative effects of long-term exposure to violence might result in an inability to regulate emotion, and cognitive and behavioural developmental delays.⁴

There is evidence of a link between exposure to family violence in childhood and the intergenerational transmission of violence,⁵ as well as alcohol and drug use.⁶ Children whose formative years are affected are vulnerable to developing long term mental health issues, which is itself a risk factor for both experiencing and perpetrating family violence.⁷

The potential relevance of evidence of childhood exposure to domestic and family violence in sentencing proceedings includes an assessment of moral culpability; moderating the weight to be given to general deterrence; and determining the weight to be given to specific deterrence and protection of the community. There may also be issues relating to the likelihood of hardship in custody, a finding of special circumstances and the shaping of conditions to enhance prospects of rehabilitation.
